

When we annotate method with `@Transactional`. Spring opens a Hibernate Session and a persistence context for the entire method call. When a lazy relationship is accessed inside a transactional method, Hibernate uses the open session to fetch the related data on demand. However, without `@Transactional`, the session closes too early, causing a `LazyInitializationException` if lazy-loaded relationships are accessed outside the session.